

STRIKING A BLOW FOR TRUTH

OCTOBER 14. Holland has made a breakthrough in the area of common sense. Its Advertising Code Commission has stated that ads which claim Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) is a brain disease are FRAUDULENT.

America, take notice.

Two Dutch citizens brought a complaint against the Brain Foundation Netherlands, which has been running the ads.

The citizens made their case. There is no evidence showing that ADHD stems from a malfunction of the brain.

When they realized they were on the losing end, the Brain Foundation said that, since they are a non-profit group, their ads are not really ads. This argument was struck down. The Foundation uses the ads for fund-raising purposes.

So now we have a nation which officially labels ADHD a fraud. Not bad. Not bad at all.

Next, they should get to work on so-called clinical depression. This too is said to be a disease stemming from brain malfunction. Note: I am NOT saying that the popular use of the term "depression" is a misnomer. But when the medical honchos hijack that term and call it a full-fledged disease or disorder, they have to submit a root cause which applies in all cases. They have never done so. As in, NEVER
