

Q: Those are the other six global cartels.

A: Right. And then there were these other groups. The Council on Foreign Relations. The Trilateral Commission. The Bilderbergers. The Roundtable group in England. The Rockefeller Foundation. The Carnegie Foundation. The UN. A group of bankers. The IMF. The World Bank. The Federal Reserve. And these non-government groups were very, very powerful. Still are. This whole system was a muddy thing to try to understand.

Q: And will this world government be centered at the UN?

A: Don't hold your breath. The UN is one of those organizations that facilitates the cooperation. That's what it's there for. To help grease the wheels.

A: The military is a cartel of its own. Its job is to form up a global army of many nations that can go anywhere and do anything to preserve the cartel structure. So although its orders come from governments, it also acts on its own. It sews up agreements within itself, among various national armies. It does that on its own. And this is part of the process of waking up to itself, to its own power that exists apart from any government. The old job of an army, to protect the borders and the integrity of a nation—that is taking more of a back seat to these other concerns: The building of a global army that has no allegiance to the idea of the nation-state. Globalization from the military point of view.

A: I'll say it is. Let's say you want to put the local government in your community back on track. You want it to be small, compact, and very supportive of individual freedom and choice in all areas of life. You want that government to do everything it can to keep the federal government out of the business of the citizens. Now that is a very worthwhile goal. And it can be accomplished. It can be done. We're not talking about something out of the range of human possibility. And if a hundred, a thousand communities really do that, you begin to turn the situation around in a big way. You spread the word. You lead by example. And you make life harder for the cartels, which are entirely based on taking freedom away from people. But then the government cartel is taxing everyone at a horrible level. Money is tight. People are strung out on credit. So what do people do? They set the new goal of making enough money to get by. They take jobs they would never ordinarily take. They shrink. They forget that other tremendous goal. They give it up. They leave the battlefield. And that is a psy op worked in every way, every day, by these cartels. They want people to believe that freedom is NOT a thing you stick your neck out for.

A: Yes. It all starts and ends with the individual. People say the forces against us are too great. But they're dead wrong. The cartels are trying to build a world in which people are afraid to act. Afraid of losing their precious jobs and their friends. Afraid of the unknown consequences. It's all about fear. And about the sense of comfort. People won't give up their comfort. Well, comfort is one of those shrunken down goals. It's a goal that happens AFTER the person is already cowed into some kind of fear. There is nothing wrong with creature comforts. But putting that at the top of the list...it doesn't belong there.

A: Yes. Everything seems to be on the level of helping people, giving them information and reporting on what's going on. But again, from my experience in the military, they are reporting on wars that are happening for reasons that have nothing to do with their stories. I learned that the hard way. I lost soldiers for reasons that...I wouldn't walk across the street for those reasons. I woke up after my active career was over.
